The National Prevention Science Coalition and RTI International will co-host a congressional briefing on deploying prevention strategies to improve racial equity. Research and experience provide guidance about what works to reduce racial disparities and improve health outcomes for all Americans. Despite the existence of strategies shown to reduce inequities and foster equitable practices, translating that knowledge into effective policies has lagged behind the science.

During this briefing, national experts on this topic will present approaches to advance equity by implementing prevention-informed policies, especially in the areas of health and education. Speakers will discuss policies likely to have a population level impact and others that are targeted to specific social conditions within communities. They will also discuss how researchers and public sectors can work together to enact such change.

For more information & registration:
https://www.npscoalition.org/briefing-announcement